

Separation declaration

Family Law Act 1975

Important information about this declaration

Who should use this declaration?

You should use this declaration if you have:

- entered into a superannuation agreement with your former spouse, and
- separated, but are not divorced, from your former spouse.

You should not complete the declaration if you have divorced from your former spouse. Instead, you should provide us with a certified copy of your decree absolute.

How to use this declaration

Please use CAPITAL LETTERS and a black or blue pen.

Mark boxes like this ☐ with a cross (X) then fill out the next question or section.

Does my former spouse have to complete this as well?

No. The declaration only needs to be signed by either you or your former spouse to be effective. You may both sign the declaration if you wish.

What happens if neither of us completes this declaration?

If neither you nor your former spouse serves a properly completed declaration on Commonwealth Superannuation Corporation (CSC), your superannuation agreement will not be effective.

What happens if I make a false declaration?

There are severe penalties for providing a false or misleading declaration. A person serving a false declaration on CSC may be subject to 12 months imprisonment. Therefore, you should not complete the appropriate declaration if it could amount to a false declaration.

Important

The meaning of separated is defined under sections 48 and 90XP(4) of the Family Law Act 1975. You should consider seeking professional advice if you are unsure whether you satisfy this definition.

CSC cannot provide you with that information.
